

Amana Living recognised in national community care award

10 November 2008

WA aged care organisation Amana Living has been recognised for its dedication to community care after becoming a finalist in the National Community Care Organisation of the Year awards.

Organised by the peak body Aged and Community Services Australia (ACSA), the annual awards promote and recognise excellence in a range of areas which contribute to the quality of life of older people, people with disabilities and their carers.

Ray Glickman, CEO of Amana Living, said becoming a finalist in the national awards gives recognition to the organisation's staff, who he says are immensely dedicated to meeting clients' needs.

"This award recognises the support workers, coordinators and managers who work tirelessly in our community teams and who are totally focused on providing the highest standards of care and services to our clients and families," he said.

"The expansion of our community services has been extensive over the past two years, but our staff have ensured this has occurred without reducing the flexibility and customer focus of the services we provide.

"We are becoming a large community service provider, however we haven't lost that small service feel and I believe becoming a national finalist in this award category really does recognise that achievement."

Amana Living operates 17 retirement villages, 10 hostels, five nursing homes and three day clubs throughout Western Australia. It provides specialised care for dementia residents and their families, as well as a wide range of community services to people living in their own homes.
